was Gwendoline's choking thought.

She went to her room and sat thinking. Miss Chatworth was a mere "tame cat," not to be thought of as a source of counsel. Gwendoline hat to settle the problem for herself. She felt herself grow old and staid. She felt that it was for her, first of all, to sustain her dignity. She had broken her engagement in peremptory fashion. But she must not act childishly. Alex had accused her of subjecting herself to criticism. She must hold her impulses in restraint and behave as befitted proud old Gideon Dane's grand-laughter. Perhaps Alex would belp her to make this termination spicuous as might be. She would not fly-like some crushed, defeated creature. She would carry herself calmly, tell some smooth lie, as others did, about important business calling her suddenly back to Virginia, and then in a day or two she would leave, the sooner the better, heaven knew-would fly fast as steam could bear her back to her mounther miserable memories.

She did not go down to dinner, but before tea time, carefully dressed in rich dack lace, with the Dane diamon's which she had not worn before, around her throat and in her ears, she took her seat on the pazza, with a novel in her hand whose words she did not see. She saw Vincent come in with a company of young men from a saiibout, and to harriedly to his room, without looking in her direction. By and by he re appeared in evening dress, and G wendo-line remembered there was a dance that evening in the house.
